Why Certain Trade Agreements Are Approved as Congressional-Executive Agreements Rather Than as Treaties

Jeanne J. Grimmett
Legislative Attorney
American Law Division

Summary

Trade agreements such as the NAFTA and the World Trade Organization (WTO) agreements have been approved by majority vote of each House of Congress rather than by two-thirds vote of the Senate — that is, they have been treated as congressional-executive agreements rather than as treaties. The congressional-executive agreement has been the vehicle for implementing Congress' long-standing policy of seeking trade benefits for the United States through reciprocal trade negotiations. In a succession of statutes, Congress has authorized the President to negotiate and enter into tariff and nontariff barrier (NTB) agreements for limited periods, while mandating that NTB and free trade area agreements negotiated under this authority could enter into force for the United States only if approved by both Houses in a bill enacted into public law and other statutory conditions were met. The President was again granted temporary trade agreement negotiating authority utilizing this approval procedure in the Trade Act of 2002 (P.L. 107-210); the authority will expire in mid-2005 unless extended. Free trade agreements (FTAs) with Chile and Singapore were approved and implemented under this statute in 2003; FTAs with Australia and Morocco have been approved by Congress in 2004. In February 2001, a U.S. circuit court dismissed an appeal challenging the constitutionality of the NAFTA on the ground that the agreement was not entered into as a treaty, the court ruling that the issue was a nonjusticiable political question (Made in the USA Foundation v. United States, 242 F.3d 1300 (11th Cir. 2001)); the U.S. Supreme Court denied review in the case. This report will be updated.

Statutory Authority for Trade Agreements. The most recent broad-gauged trade agreements entered into by the United States – the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), the World Trade Organization (WTO) Agreement, and the multilateral WTO trade agreements that a country must accept as a condition of WTO membership – were negotiated by the President and submitted to Congress under the terms of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988 (OTCA) and the Trade Act of 1974. The OTCA provided the President with authority to negotiate and enter into tariff and nontariff trade barrier (NTB) agreements until June 1, 1993, authority that was The negotiation, entry into, and implementation of trade agreements implicates the President's Article II authority to negotiate treaties and international agreements and to conduct foreign affairs (see United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 319 (1936)) and Congress' express power to impose duties and tariffs and to regulate foreign commerce (U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cls. 1, 3). Because of Congress' express power in the area, the President may not impose, reduce, or effect any other change in existing duty rates through an executive agreement unless he has been delegated the authority to do so by Congress. See United States v. Yoshida Int'l Inc., 526 F.2d 560, 572 (C.C.P.A. 1975)("no undelegated power to regulate commerce, or to set tariffs, inheres in the Presidency") (emphasis in the original); United States v. Guy W. Capps, Inc., 204 F.2d 655, 660 (4th Cir. 1953)("Imports from a foreign country are foreign commerce subject to regulation, so far as this country is concerned, by Congress alone."). Regarding the President's authority to enter into agreements involving foreign commerce, see Consumers Union of U.S., Inc. v. Kissinger, 506 F.2d 136 (D.C.Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1004(1975)(mandatory or enforceable, but not voluntary agreements limiting exports to the United States are superseded by trade laws).

The use of the congressional-executive agreement in the trade area has been viewed as a recognition of the House's constitutional role in revenue raising. American Law Institute, Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States § 303, Reporters' Note 9 (1987). Senate deference to the use of the congressional-executive agreement for the Uruguay Round agreements may arguably be inferred from its 76-16 vote to amend the OTCA to extend the date by which the President could enter into the agreements pursuant to this statute, the yeas constituting more than two-thirds of that body. 139 Cong. Rec. 14805 (1993).

Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649 (1892). In denying a motion for a temporary restraining order against tariff reductions on electronic equipment, the U.S. Court of International Trade ruled that...
Congress authorized the President, for limited periods, to enter into reciprocal tariff agreements with foreign countries and, within a designated range, to proclaim tariffs needed to implement these agreements without subsequent congressional approval. This authority was used to enter into numerous reciprocal trade agreements, to proclaim new tariffs as a result, and to enter into the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). The President's modification of tariffs under this statute was likewise held to be valid under the Treaty Clause, federal courts having acknowledged that not all international undertakings of the United States are concluded as treaties and that congressional-executive trade agreements could find a constitutional basis in the joint exercise of Congress' tariff and commerce authorities and the President's foreign affairs power.\(^4\)

As GATT parties began to negotiate more extensively to eliminate nontariff trade barriers in a number of areas, Congress enacted legislation that would both provide the President with negotiating credibility and ensure that Congress carried out its constitutional responsibilities regarding legislative implementation of the agreements. Since NTB agreements could address a variety of regulatory matters (e.g., subsidies, government procurement, product standards), these agreements might require more elaborate changes in federal law than tariff agreements, which for the most part could be implemented through a pre-authorized presidential proclamation reducing tariffs on particular items. In contrast, if legislation were needed to implement NTB agreements, Congress could choose not to vote on such legislation or could add amendments that might be viewed as inconsistent with agreement obligations. At the same time, overly broad delegations of authority to the President to implement NTB agreements or legislative vetoes of executive implementing actions might not comport with constitutional requirements regarding the passage of legislation. In the Trade Act of 1974, Congress provided the President with new authority to negotiate multilateral trade agreements for a limited period of time, allowing him to proclaim certain tariff reductions and modifications but requiring him to submit NTB agreements to Congress, which would vote on their approval and on legislation necessary or appropriate to implement them.\(^5\) plaintiffs were unlikely to prevail in their argument that the tariff proclamation authority used was an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority. Kemet Electronics Corp. v. Barshefsky, 969 F.Supp. 82, 86 (Ct. Int'l Trade 1997). While the court viewed the principles by which the President was to be guided as “allow[ing] a great deal of discretion,” it did not find them to be “unintelligible.” Id. at 86; see also Kemet Electronics Corp. v. Barshefsky, 976 F.Supp. 1012, 1019 (Ct. Int’l Trade 1997)(motion for preliminary injunction denied). The statute at issue was § 111(b) of the Uruguay Round Agreements Act, 19 U.S.C. § 3521(b), under which the President could modify tariffs in order to implement certain trade agreements whose negotiation had begun but had not concluded during the Uruguay Round provided he first consult with Congress. The President proclaimed WTO-agreed tariff reductions on information technology, distilled spirits, pharmaceuticals, and chemical products under this authority. Pres. Proc. 7011, 62 Fed. Reg. 35909 (1997); Pres. Proc. 6982, 62 Fed. Reg. 16039 (1997).

---

\(^3\) (...continued)

\(^5\) Modifying an Administration proposal, the House in 1973 approved legislation that would have authorized the President to negotiate tariff and nontariff barrier (NTB) agreements for a given
Because of the complexities of multilateral negotiation, Congress sought to provide the President with a sound negotiating posture by providing that it would consider trade agreement implementing legislation submitted under the terms of the statute (including requirements that the President notify and consult with Congress) within a prescribed period of time and without amendment.6

The fast-track procedure contained in the 1974 Act was first used with respect to the GATT Tokyo Round Agreements, which were approved and implemented in 1979 (P.L. 96-39). Temporary statutory authority for bilateral free-trade area agreements (FTAs) was added in the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984 (P.L. 98-473, § 401) and was again provided for in the OTCA. Congress approved bilateral FTAs with Israel and Canada, the NAFTA, and the GATT Uruguay Round agreements under one or the other of these authorities (P.L. 99-47, P.L. 100-449, P.L. 103-182, P.L. 103-465). The FTA with Jordan was statutorily implemented in 2001, though not under a fast-track authorizing statute and without an express approval provision (P.L. 107-43). Renewed trade negotiation authority was considered in the 104th and 105th Congresses but not enacted into public law. The President subsequently sought such authority from the 107th Congress and was granted it in Title XXI of the Trade Act of 2002, P.L. 107-210. The authority applies to implementing bills for trade agreements entered into before July 1, 2005, and may be extended for agreements entered into before July 1, 2007, “if (and only if)” the President requests an extension and neither House of the Congress adopts an extension disapproval resolution before June 1, 2005 (P.L. 107-210, § 2103(c)(1)).

FTAs with Chile and

---

5 (...continued)

period. Once the agreements were concluded, the President would submit them to Congress along with any needed draft implementing orders and proclamations. The agreements and orders and proclamations would become law (thus superseding inconsistent prior statutes) provided neither House had passed a resolution of disapproval by majority of those present and voting within 90 days. See H.Rept. 93-571, at 6, 23-34, 41-42. The Senate, whose Finance Committee viewed the veto approach to be of doubtful constitutionality, prevailed in the adoption of the current requirement for two-House legislative approval of NTB agreements and enactment of implementing legislation on a fast-track basis. See S.Rept. 93-1298, at 14-15, 22, 76, 107. Objections to the one-House veto procedure had also been raised earlier in dissenting views in the House report. H.Rept. 93-571, at 199. The Supreme Court eventually held legislative vetoes unconstitutional in Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983).

6 S.Rept. 93-1298, at 77, 107. While these agreements could be submitted to the Senate as treaties (see H.Rept. 93-571, at 24; S.Rept. 93-1298, at 86), neither the agreements nor their implementing legislation would be entitled to expedited legislative consideration. Moreover, while the House would have a role in approving any implementing legislation, it would not expressly approve the agreements, that is, it would not vote on whether the United States should accept the international obligations therein. The United States has undertaken trade obligations in treaties, specifically its bilateral friendship, commerce and navigation (FCN) treaties, which contain obligations to accord most-favored-nation tariff treatment and other trade benefits to the goods of treaty partners. With the conclusion of many bilateral tariff agreements pursuant to the reciprocal trade agreements legislation, the subsequent development of the GATT, and the entry into WTO agreements and free trade area agreements, trade obligations between the United States and its trading partners are now primarily defined by these more recent agreements.

7 These provisions apply to trade agreements entered into under § 2103(b) of the Trade Act of 2002, which authorizes the President to enter into agreements addressing both tariffs and (continued...)
nontariff barriers. Section 2004(a) of H.R. 1047, 108th Congress, as passed the House and the Senate, would make technical amendments to the statute changing the date before which a disapproval resolution must be adopted to July 1, 2005, and the dates before which the President may enter into agreements under § 2103(b) to July 1, 2005 and, if authorities are extended, July 1, 2007. The dates set forth in current § 2103(b) are June 1, 2005, and June 1, 2007, respectively.

This legislation has not yet been signed into law. For further information on pending agreements and negotiations, see CRS Issue Brief IB10123, Trade Negotiations in the 108th Congress, by Ian F. Fergusson and Lenore M. Sek, and the USTR website: [http://www.ustr.gov].

Made in the USA Foundation et al. v. United States, 56 F.Supp.2d 1226 (W.D.Ala. 1999). A similar constitutional challenge was lodged to the 1995 extradition agreement between the United States and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, which had been entered into as an executive agreement and implemented pursuant to § 1342 of P.L. 104-106. Petitioner argued that a treaty was constitutionally required for an extradition. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit disagreed, finding that neither the text of the Constitution, constitutional history, nor historical practice supported such a requirement. Mtakirutimana v. Reno, 184 F.3d 419 (5th Cir. 1999). Addressing the Supreme Court’s ruling in Valentine v. United States, 299 U.S. 5 (1936), that executive power to extradite must be based in a statute or a treaty, the court found that the required authorization could be found in the above-cited law, which, along with the Agreement, created the constitutionally sufficient “congressional-executive agreement” used in this case.
On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, while agreeing that appellants had standing, held that the issue of whether an international commercial agreement such as the NAFTA is a treaty that must be approved by two-thirds of the Senate was a nonjusticiablc political question. The court dismissed the appeal and remanded the case to the district court with instructions to vacate its decision. The U.S. Supreme Court denied certiorari in the case November 26, 2001 (United Steelworkers of America v. United States, 122 S.Ct. 613 (2001)). Under the political question doctrine, a court will decline to rule on the merits of a case if it finds that the underlying matter is committed to the discretion and expertise of the Legislative and Executive Branches. In the instant case, the Eleventh Circuit applied a tripartite inquiry that it said was suggested by Justice Lewis Powell in Goldwater v. Carter, 444 U.S. 996 (1979), a distillation of criteria for determining justiciability originally identified in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962). The three questions posed by the court were as follows: “(i) Does the issue involve resolution of questions committed by the text of the Constitution to a coordinate branch of government? (ii) Would resolution of the question demand that a court move beyond judicial expertise? (iii) Do prudential considerations counsel against judicial intervention?”

Regarding the first question, the court stated that “with respect to commercial agreements, we find that the Constitution’s clear assignment of authority to the political branches of the Government over our nation’s foreign affairs counsels against an intrusive role for this court in overseeing the actions of the President and Congress in this matter.” Along with the “vast” express constitutional grants of power conferred upon the political branches in the areas of foreign affairs and commerce, the court, citing United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936), pointed to the Supreme Court’s longstanding recognition of the power of the political branches to conclude international “agreements that do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense.” With respect to the second question, the court concluded that a ruling on the merits would in fact require it to consider areas beyond its expertise, noting that the Treaty Clause did not set forth circumstances under which Clause procedures must be followed when approving international commercial agreements; that the appellants did not provide the court with a useful analytical framework for distinguishing between agreements that require Senate approval and those that do not; that foreign affairs considerations militated against judicial interference; and that having to determine the “significance” of an international agreement as the key factor in determining whether it should be a treaty or not would “unavoidably thrust [the court] into making policy judgments of the sort unsuited for the judicial branch.” As for prudential considerations, the court cited three factors that underlay its decision not to rule on the merits: (1) the need for the nation to speak with uniformity in the area of foreign affairs and commerce, and, quoting Baker, not risk “the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question”; (2) the fact that a judicial order declaring the NAFTA invalid “could have a profoundly negative effect on this nation’s economy and its ability to deal with other foreign powers,” noting that such an order “would not only affect the validity of NAFTA, but would potentially undermine every other major international commercial agreement made over the past half-century”; and (3) the risk of “intruding upon the respect due coordinate branches of government” that would be run by a judicial review of the executive-legislative process for entry into international agreements.

---

11 Made in the USA Foundation et al. v. United States, 242 F.3d 1300 (11th Cir. 2001).